The fire built in the offset firebox creates heat and smoke, which flavors the food and cooks it using indirect heat. To control the level of smoke and heat in the central chamber, offset smokers have a chimney, generally attached at the opposite end to the firebox, and a vent on the side of the firebox.

"When you have good clean heat, good clean fire, you're not going to see the smoke." Once it's time to put the brisket into the smoker, place it fat side up. When it comes to cooking time, prepare to allot about an hour per pound with the meat cooking at a temperature of around 250 degrees-slow and low.

Well-seasoned oak burns evenly and turns readily into charcoal, those glowing embers that generate the consistent heat needed for low-temperature, indirect cooking while the bark helps to generate smoke. Pecan wood adds a touch of sweetness and nuttiness to the meat, though most pitmasters would not recommend the use of pecan exclusively.
