The Corn Laws. The Manchester School of Economics and the Anti-Corn-Law League were the end product of 60 years of evolution of the idea of free trade. Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, published in 1776, first advocated the principle of free trade as the basis for the development of a nation's 'natural economy', especially an industrial nation.

The Corn Laws

Normally, under conditions of free trade, there is always an abundant supply of goods for the needs of the community but these laws ensured that there was not every year a stock of foreign grain in Ireland which could have been enough to alleviate the disastrous effects of the failure of the potato crops. Thus, Peel repealed these laws in 1846, seeing that they were a potential cause of human suffering.

In 1846, however, the situation had changed dramatically with the Corn Laws being abolished in favour of free trade. In Political Economy and Peel's Repeal of the Corn Laws, Douglas Irwin suggests that there were two possible reasons why Britain shifted to free trade in 1846: ideological change in Peel's views and the impact of pressure groups.

How the Repeal of the Corn Laws Toppled Mercantilism ...

Conservative MPs (the Peelites) to vote for repeal in 1846. While industrialization increased the pressure for free trade, repeal occurred in 1846 only because Peel convinced his followers that a vote for repeal was in line with general Conservative ideology, and that it was necessary to preserve the political power of the landed aristocracy.

From the Corn Laws to Free Trade - LSE

The Manchester school of liberal thought embraced the repeal as an emblem of the triumph of free trade over protectionism, and of the middle class over the landed interest, but such attempts to assign symbolic significance obscures the complexity of actual historical developments. Indeed, before the repeal, there had been many landowners who questioned whether the Corn Laws of 1815 served ...
