#1. Hero cult was a fundamentally local practice, confined to a specific locale. There were literally thousands of hero-cults throughout the locales of the ancient Greek-speaking world. Every locale had its own set of local heroes. (For example, in the "demes" or local districts that constitute the urban / rural complex of Athens, each "deme" has a variety of local cult heroes.)

Pindar's epinician poetry and the cult of heroes are therefore pursued independently as well as jointly throughout the study, in order to explore the link between the heroes honoured in Pindar and actual hero-cults. Among the paradigms of our modern view of Greek hero-cults is the notion that to receive a hero-cult, a person had to be dead.

Heroes—Living or Dead? - Oxford Handbooks

Greek hero cult has been extensively discussed by both archaeologists and philologists. This paper con-siders two current hypotheses: one links the development of hero cult in the eighth century B.C. with the circulation of Homeric poetry; the other views hero cult as a transformation of ancestral veneration in the context of the emergent polis.
