The author of the project was Adolf Loos, who collaborated with the architect Karel Lhota on the project. Outwardly, the building appears austere functionalist; it is its interior layout that is of particular interest (so called Raumplan - Loos invention - each room is situated at different height levels, which are interconnected by stairs). Until 1948 the villa served as a residential house ...

VILLA MULLER

The Villa Muller is famous for it's demonstration of Adolf Loos' Raumplan, or three dimensional plan approach to designing and conceiving of a building. The elements studied therefore centered around the expression of the Raumplan through the creation of uniquely readable facade through fenestration placement, as well as investigating the circulation through the building with it's ...

Loos's Raumplan reached its apotheosis in his last domestic works, Moller House and Villa Muller of 1928 and 1930. As anticipated in the open stair hall of the Rufer House, both these works are organized about displacements in the respective levels of their principal floors, elisions that serve not only to create spatial movement but also to differentiate one living area from the next.

Villa Müller in Prague was designed by architect Adolf Loos, assisted by architect Karel Lhota, in 1930 for František Müller and his wife, Milada Müllerová. The client was the owner of a company specialized in reinforced concrete, so the house was to be a showcase of this (at the time) pioneering technique as well as of the influent architect's theories. The Villa, with its cubic shape ...

Adolf Loos' Villa Müller, which he built in Prague in 1930, is perhaps one of the Viennese architect's projects that stands out most clearly as his professional testament. Releasing architecture from the constraints of ornament and the superfluous, rediscovering its original role as a shelter for the activities of human beings, and understanding that three-dimensional space should be ...
